What I heard tonight — Earlier today I wondered whether President Obama's speech about Afghanistan would sound more like a description of a war plan or a structured settlement of a legal dispute. What I heard tonight tilted decidedly in the latter direction.

The image shows a Tumblr post from Newsweek. At the top, there are several small images: the Olympic rings, a graphic titled "ICED OUT", and a meme titled "Who knows, man, who really knows?" featuring a portrait of Dick Cheney holding a stimulus check. To the right of the meme is a cartoon strip with dialogue about religion and science. Below these images is a Tumblr post from Newsweek, dated Tuesday, December 1, 2009. The post features a quote from Michael Isikoff about Dick Cheney's beef with Barack Obama or the American public. The quote reads: "You have to wonder if his (Dick Cheney) beef is with Barack Obama or with the American public? The quote that leapt out at me in the Politico interview was; 'Here's a guy (Obama) without much experience who campaigned about much of what we put in place and now travels around the world apologizing. I think our adversaries see that as a sign of weakness.'" Below the quote is a response: "Well, right Mr. Former Vice President! He campaigned against what you did and he won the election! The American public decided that is what they wanted! They rejected your policies and voted in favor of his. So, is his beef with Barack Obama, or is it with the American public that chose the path Barack Obama laid out?" The post is attributed to Michael Isikoff on Dick Cheney's Politico interview, via msnbc's hardball earlier today, and is shared via brooklynmutt.

Tilera Taunts Intel with a 100-core chip

By ASHLEE VANCE

If you're a chip start-up, one of the last things you want is the attention of Intel. It's usually best to nibble around the areas Intel has ignored rather than waving a giant red cape, announcing your intent to take a stab at one of Intel's main businesses. Intel tends to respond to such gestures with incredible force and has bested just about all up and comers.

And so, the chip start-up Tilera really put itself to the test this week by boasting that it has created the world's first 100-core chip – a product capable of giving Intel a run for its money in the high-profit server chip market.

Tilera came to life in 2004 and grew out of chip research, much of it funded by the federal government's Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency, done at M.I.T.

The company's founders correctly forecast an era when chip makers would struggle to increase the raw speed of their chips – MHz and GHz – and instead need to focus on adding more cores to each chip to boost performance. To the Tilera founders, it made sense to create an altogether new chip design for this changing world rather than trying to adapt older designs to the multi-core model. Read more...
